HEALTH CARE PROVIDED LIENS

What is a Health Care Provider Lien? What does it do? Should I sign it? Will it help me collect an account? These are all good questions, and our client service representatives hear these from time to time. So I thought this would be a good topic to discuss in this month's newsletter.

The simplest definition of a health care provider lien is this: A health care provider lien gives a health care provider certain legal rights to the proceeds a patient may receive from a potential settlement or judgment resulting from a pending case to recover money from a third party who may be liable to the patient. I know what you're thinking, that's the simple definition??? Maybe there isn't a "simple" definition after all. ☺

Let me put it another way. We usually see liens offered by personal injury attorneys. Here's what happens: A patient will be in an accident which was caused by someone else. They hire a personal injury attorney to represent them and go after the other person's insurance company. After analyzing the case, if the attorney believes the insurance company will eventually pay a settlement, he will send an offer to the healthcare providers who had provided medical care after the accident, to grant them a lien on any potential settlement or judgment—after his fees have been paid, of course.

If the health care provider agrees and signs the lien, they will have a legal claim to any money the insurance company may pay out in a settlement or judgment (after attorney fees have been paid). The lien gives the health care provider the right to collect money from that insurance company before they pay the patient.

That's the most common scenario we see with health care liens and the definition answers the first two questions I posed earlier: What is a health care lien? What does it do? Now let's answer the other two questions: Should I sign a health care lien? Will it help me collect the account? Here's the answer: It depends. Since a health care lien doesn't guarantee anything, you first must consider several factors. Remember, it only gives you the right to be paid IF a settlement is reached or IF a judgment is entered. If neither happens, your lien is worthless. However, if the debtor is indigent, or working but makes so little money they will never be able to pay the bill, a lien may be your only hope. The trick is making sure you don't consider a lien as a guarantee because you will certainly be disappointed sometimes.

Also, some liens have wording that prevents you from taking any other collection action until the case has been resolved. A lien like this could be a bad thing. It makes you wait and ties your hands when it comes to collecting the account. If the debtor is in a good financial situation, I wouldn't sign a lien that limited my ability to collect. However, if the lien allows you to still ask for payment and doesn't make you wait until the case is resolved, I would sign it. Then I would turn the account over to NAR. You will, of course, need to have your attorney review each lien before you sign it and make sure you understand the limitations for each one.

When a client asks us about a lien, we go through this process with them. We make sure the lien has been analyzed by their attorney, and once we all understand what can and can't be done, the client then decides. Sometimes they sign the lien and wait. Other times they don't sign the lien, but instead, turn the account over to us. Still other times they sign a lien (when it doesn't restrict their collection attempts) and still send the account to us. We've had many successes collecting accounts where a client didn't sign a lien AND where they did. The key is to contact us so we can help you analyze all aspects of the account: from the specific details of the lien, to the patient's ability to pay. Once we do this, I'm certain we will find the best solution to each individual scenario.

There you have it. Now you're an expert on health care liens, and you'll know exactly what to do the next time you encounter one. Give us a call if you have any questions or email us at: ClientService@North-American-Recovery.com. I'd also be happy to receive an email if you have questions on this topic or any others I may have covered in the past. You can also search our newsletter archive here: <http://www.North-American-Recovery.com/newsletters.html>. We have newsletters from the last four years on our website, but I've been writing them since 1994, so I have a lot of older ones I'd be happy to send you. Email me if you're interested or if you have another topic you'd like to see covered.
