PEOPLE SAY THE CRAZIEST THINGS

BY: David J. Saxton

President, NORTH AMERICAN RECOVERY

I've seen and heard some crazy things over the years. And just when I think I've heard it all, I'm surprised again. This month I wanted to share two examples of some interesting exchanges we've had with people. The first was entirely over the phone and was with a consumer. The second was a face-to-face exchange with a consumer's mother and a brave little girl.

Recently, one of our collectors was going about her job the way she normally does. However, while attempting to collect what appeared to be an average account, the consumer refused to tell the collector where he worked and even refused to say if he had a job.

This would have frustrated some collectors, but not ours. The collector simply did the next best thing; she called his neighbor and asked the neighbor if the consumer was currently employed. Everything she did was completely legal, ethical, and permissible under all state and federal collection laws. (And her calls, including the call with the neighbor, were recorded.)

When the collector talked to the neighbor, she was very discrete and in no way divulged that she was calling about a past-due bill. When asked why she was calling she simply told the neighbor, "It's about a personal business matter." The neighbor was very pleasant and even offered to give a message to the consumer.

Well, as you can imagine, the consumer was not happy that we called his neighbor. He was so upset that he called the collector and became very aggressive and said things to intimidate the collector. Suffice it to say, the call wasn't a very pleasant one. The consumer told the collector over and over again how he was a collector for an attorney, and he knew what she could and couldn't do.

Everything I've described so far is typical for our industry. People are always upset if a neighbor brings them a message from someone they don't know, so they'll call and complain about it. But since we haven't violated the law, it usually ends there.

But not with this consumer. After speaking with the collector, he called the manager. He immediately continued with his aggressive, intimidating behavior. For 15 minutes, he told our manager how the collector used numerous illegal and unethical tactics and techniques in both talking to him and when speaking to his neighbor.

Our manager followed our standard protocol and told the consumer he would listen to the calls and conduct a thorough investigation of his allegations. (Confident all along that our collector did nothing wrong.)

Here's where the story gets interesting. Our manager retrieved every call we had with the consumer, and the one short call with the neighbor. He listened to each call and as expected, verified that we had not violated any laws. Our collector was quite professional, even in when faced with the aggressiveness of the consumer. Our manager was shocked by the number of false statements made by the consumer, he forwarded every call to me.

I listened to each call, including the call the consumer had with our manager. Since I'd been notified of the nature and volume of allegations made by the consumer in advance, I decided to keep track of every allegation.

The calls totaled 20 minutes. I kept counting and by the time I was done, I'd tallied 55 false statements. I was utterly amazed!

A consumer will sometimes exaggerate about a conversation, but since they know we record our calls, they usually don't outright lie about what was said. This consumer was different. He went so far beyond anything we've ever experienced, if I hadn't have heard it with my own ears, I wouldn't have believed it. I guess he didn't think we really recorded our calls. Oh well... The last interesting thing about this exchange is at the end of the call with our manager, after 55 totally false statements, the consumer paid his bill. Go figure!

Okay, that was an example of outrageous behavior by a consumer. But they aren't the only ones who surprise us. Sometimes it's a relative. Take, for example, the exchange our process server had one evening while trying to serve a lawsuit. Here's what happened:

He went to the home of a husband and wife we were suing. He knocked on the door to serve the papers, and this is what he wrote in his supplement report:

"A little girl answered the door at Defendant's address. I asked her if Jane or John Doe were home. She said, "I don't know, I'll go see."

When she returned, she said, "No, my dad is gone." I asked her if her grandma lives here, and she said, "Yes. "I asked if I could talk to her grandma and she said, "Okay." She yelled, "Grandma, someone wants to talk to you."

A lady came to the door, I said "Hi, I guess Jane and John live here with you?" She said, "No, I'm just the babysitter, I don't live here." The little girl was standing nearby and interjected with, "Yes you do Grandma! "

I said to the lady, "The little girl says you live here. The Grandma said, "I'm just sitting!" I said again, "The little girl says that you live here with Jane and John," Grandma said, "I DON'T LIVE HERE!" At this point, the little girl said, "Then why do you have a bed downstairs Grandma??"

I then told the grandma, "I'm going to leave the summons with her I have for Jane and John". She slammed the door, so I yelled in that they are served" I secured the summons to the house."

We will end up collecting this account eventually thanks to an honest, brave little girl! Bravo for her! Hopefully she will continue with her honesty and not follow her grandma's example.

There you have it. Two examples of the type of things we experience as bill collectors. These really are the exceptions to the rule because most people are respectful and usually honest, thank goodness! That being said, I still thought you would enjoy hearing about the different encounters we have, especially the honest little girl. Thanks, and have a great month!
